Like the first robin of spring, Alesha Oreskovich is a treat for winter-weary eyes. This early bird will enjoy a solo session in the buff until interlopers force her to take flight. Kerri Kendall (next page and overleaf) confesses she's a phone junkie, even on vacation.

Months of cabin fever give way to high-spirited playfulness when improved circumstances finally release us from our foul-weather bonds. Rebecca Ferratti hadn't intended to take the plunge when she set out on her morning walk along the beach, but the temptation proved simply irresistible.

Happily for onlookers, both Cynthia Kaye (above) and Rachel Jéan Marteen (right) miscalculated the coverage the materials-at-hand afforded. Cynthia mistakenly believed the reeds would provide a discreet dressing room; Rachel thought a net would suffice as a proper suit.

When you're out of practice, finding your place in the sun on the first clear day in months can take a little time. Sami Greaves (left) seems undecided about where to settle down. Mercy Lopez (above), however, wasn't at all fussy and quickly commandeered an abandoned hammock.

Cheryl Bartel (left) hasn't got the knack of kayaking yet, and is yukking it up at her own expense. Stirred from a nap by the ruckus, Kimber Lee Hansen (above) considers a wake-up swim.

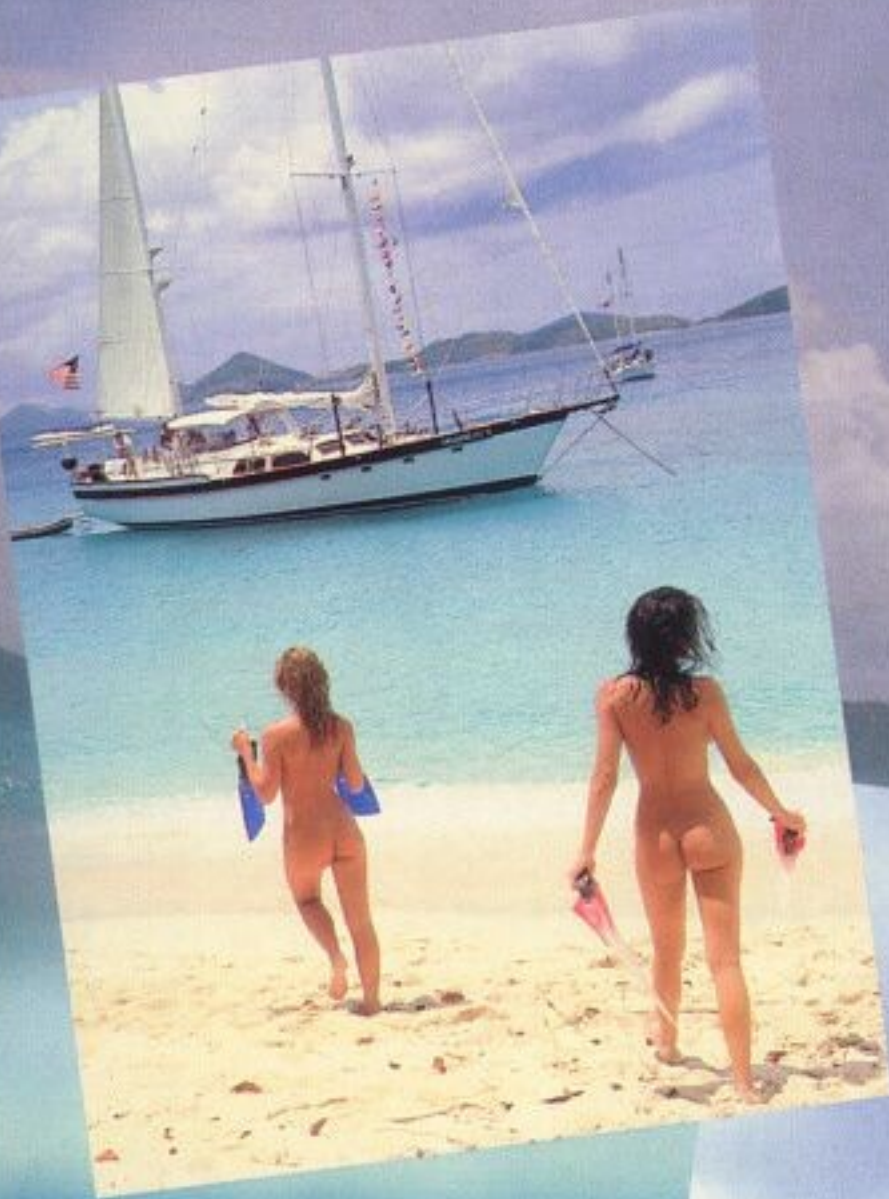

Some women are driven to abandon the mundane in search of new and exciting adventures. Taking only the bare essentials with them, Jacki Sams and Cady Cantrell accept an impromptu invitation to join a yachting party. Once on board, Jacki (below left) volunteers to swab down her shipshape shipmate Cady.

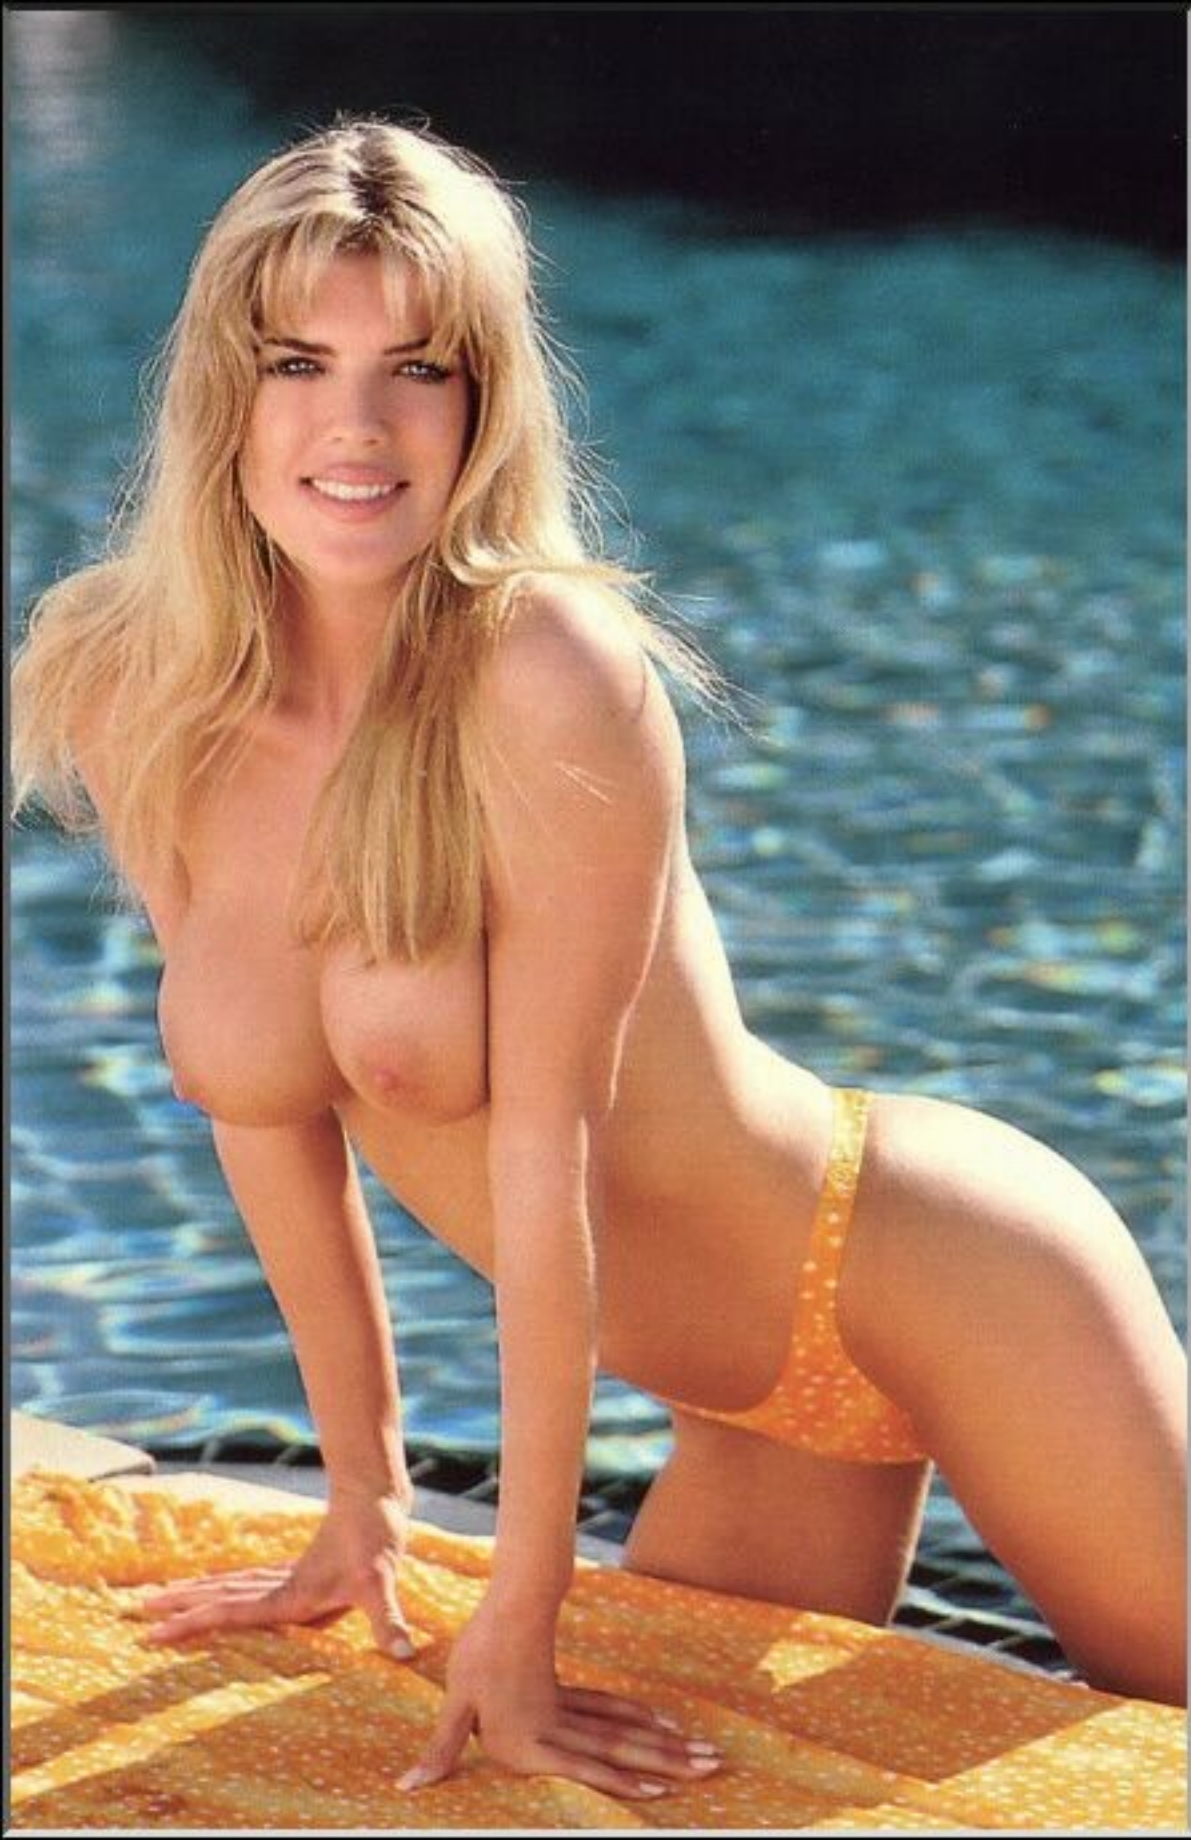

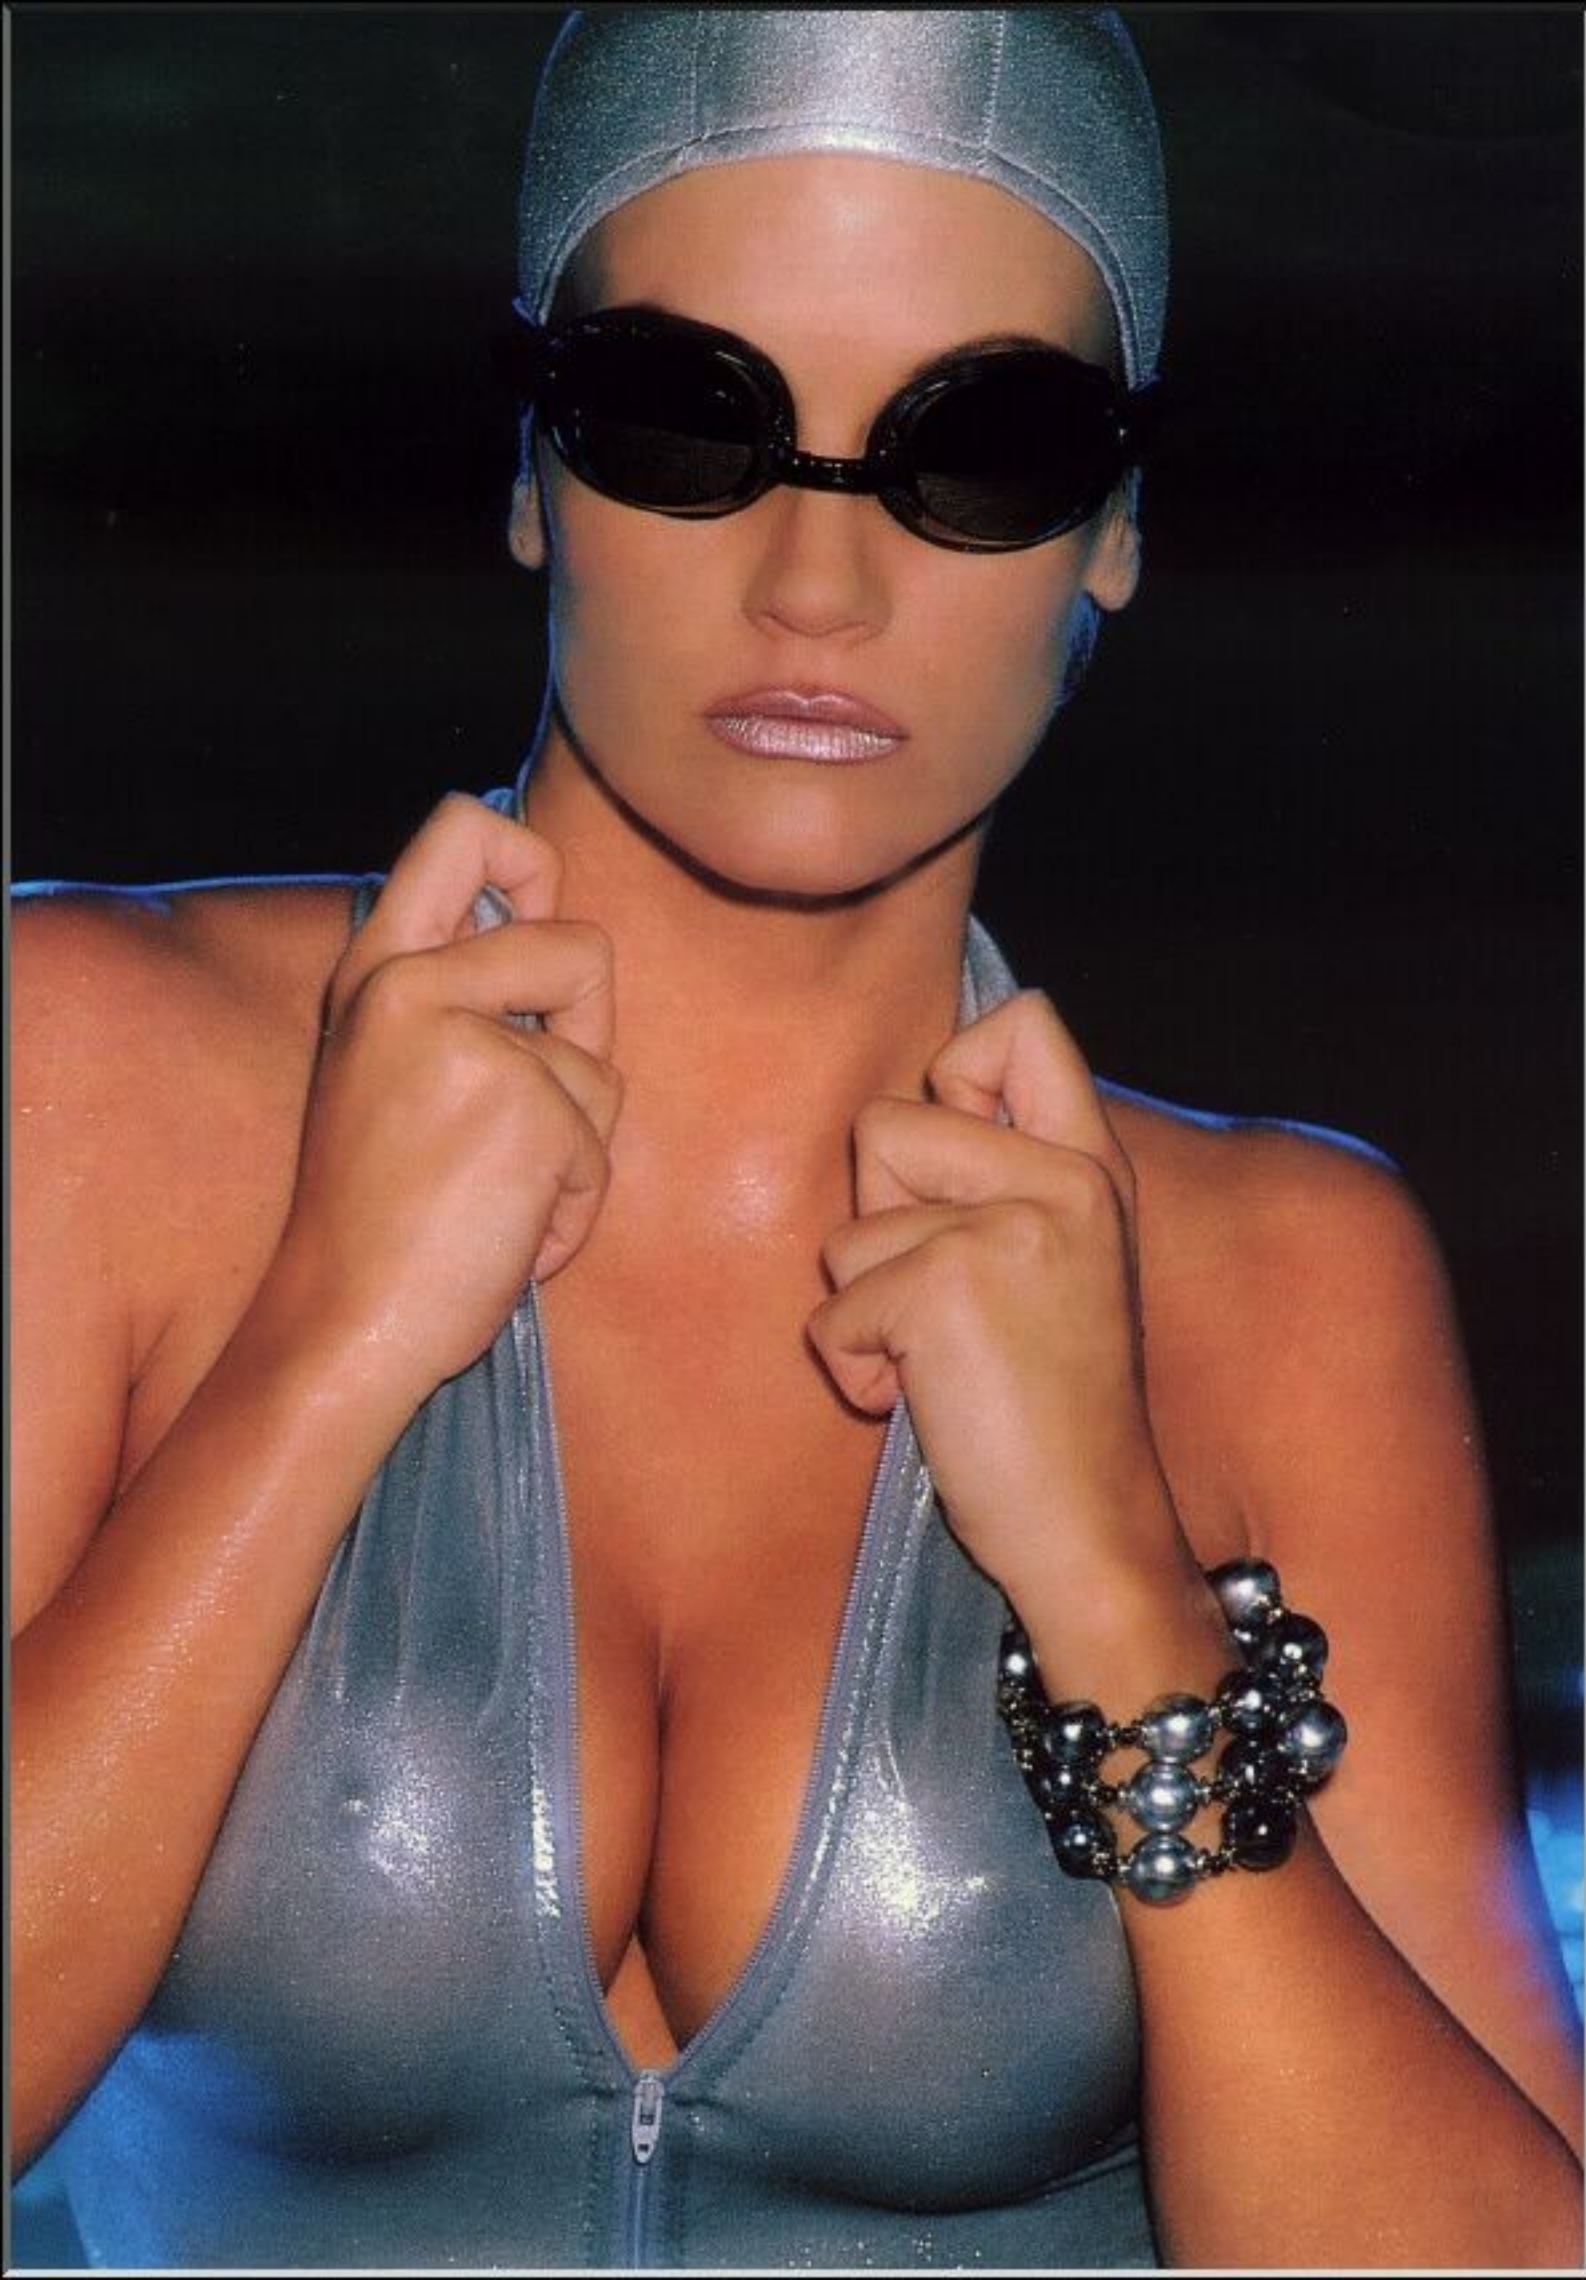

Some women can wear anything and still look great. That's especially true of Rebecca Ferratti, who combines plenty of panache and a certain attitude with stunning features and a fabulous form, enabling her to carry off the most improbable of outfits. Even a liberal coating of ooze looks good on her (overleaf).
